Social media blamed for surge in young people hit by 'midlife crisis'

Global wellbeing survey finds 15-24s less happy than older generations

Dr Vivek Murthy, the US surgeon general, said allowing children to use social media was like giving them medicine that was not proven to be safe. He said the failure of governments to better regulate social media in recent years was "insane".

Murthy spoke to the Guardian as new data revealed that young people across North America were now less happy than their elders, with the same "historic" shift expected to follow in western Europe. Declining wellbeing among under-30s has driven the US out of the top 20 list of happiest nations, the 2024 World Happiness Report revealed.

After 32 years in which people aged 15 to 24 were measured as being happier than older generations in the US, the trend appears to have flipped in 2023. The gap has also narrowed in western Europe and the same change could happen in the coming year or two, it is thought.

Murthy called the findings a "red flag that the young are really struggling in the US".

proved social media platforms were safe for children and adolescents, and called for international action to improve real-life social connections for young people.

The World Happiness Report, an annual barometer of wellbeing in 140 countries coordinated by Oxford University's Wellbeing Research Centre, Gallup and the UN Sustainable Development Solutions Network, showed "disconcerting drops (in youth happiness) especially in North America".

Hirst formaldehyde works dated to 1990s were made in 2017

Exclusive
Maeva McClellan

Three Damien Hirst sculptures that were made by preserving animals in formaldehyde were dated by his company to the 1990s even though they were made in 2017, an investigation by the Guardian has found.

The trio of works, made by preserving a dove, a shark and two calves, have in recent years been exhibited in galleries in Hong Kong, New York, Munich, London and Oxford as examples of works from the 1990s, his Turner prize-winning period.

However, all three were made by Hirst's employees at a workshop in Durdridge.
