cases; and (2) the tripartite test was supplemented by additional equitable factors such as the accused infringer's knowledge of the patent in suit, evidence of copying, and independent development.<sup>6</sup>

In Warner-Jenkinson Co. v. Hilton Davis Chemical Co., the Supreme Court resolved these conflicts by adopting the holdings of the first school that the doctrine of equivalents was available in every case, without requiring the presence of certain equitable factors. The Supreme Court held that prosecution history estoppel was not a bar to the doctrine of equivalents. The Supreme Court held that the patentee's burden to explain the amendments made in response to rejections was not satisfied if none were expressly stated in the prosecution history. With regard to the tripartite test, the Supreme Court held that this was just one way of determining the scope of the equivalents.
