North Korea fired 200 rounds of artillery into waters near its disputed western sea border with South Korea on Friday, a move that prompted the South's military to ask residents on two nearby islands to take shelter.

The shells fell north of the disputed border, known as the Northern Limit Line, between 9 and 11 a.m., and caused no damage, South Korean officials said.

The South's military accused the North of "threatening peace and raising tensions" and vowed to take "corresponding measures." Hours after, it said that it responded to the North's provocation by firing its own artillery shells into waters south of the disputed border.

North Korea Fires Artillery Near Border With South Korea

The South asked nearby islanders to seek shelter before it launched a military exercise in the disputed waters and chided the North for "threatening peace."
